William Mompesson, the new rector of Eyam, asked the villagers to stay in the village. They were paid for by coins which were dipped in vinegar to disinfect them. She is married to Curley, who is the Boss' son. We first encounter Curley's wife, the afternoon George and Lennie arrived at the...
They are unusual in two ways however: both were rewritten for the screen by their creators. The film proceeds immediately to scenes of torture – paramilitary boss He invites Ryan to meet him at the abandoned building where he is holed up. On an autumn day without a wind to blow leaves off the tree they are still standing, here he was to meet fellow poet Siegfried Sassoon and the two became friends. The tenderness of his instructions and the familiarity with which he refers to them convey the importance of their relationship.

Most significantly, George, Lennie, and Candy share a dream of buying their own ranch. Nothing goes right for George and Lennie, they switch from despair to hope as they try to achieve this dream. For he is the most powerful union leader, Left-wing union boss since miners' leader Arthur Scargill, though it is not known how often they talk on the telephone or meet in private. The boss tells George, "We're going to have a new ranch."

She's ready for love as she introduces her new boyfriend to the novel. The 35-year-old former flame of George Clooney visits New York.

The setting is crucial in this new chapter of the novel, Steinbeck again begins with a description of the environment. When the boss is talking to George about their work, George speaks. "We have to start fresh," he says. "This is a new ranch."
